From France of Wales develops great strength of constitution and vitality under the disease which has been preying upon him for weeks. Those who have contended that exiles had made such inroads on his frame that he could not stand up against disease discover that they may have been deceived, and that scandal may have exaggerated the Prince's frailties. It would seem hardly possible that his condition could have been exaggerated for political effect—to call forth the sympathies of his people; but he is long for one whose charities have been so extensively written at home and abroad. Let us hope that he may rally, and that he is on the road to convalescence.

TAMM is many indications that the Imperial dynasty will be restored in France. First the Emperor is a great intriguer, and the name of Napoleon is a spell to conjure the people with. While on the throne he made friends of the army by peculiar favors to that class, and by cultivating the military spirit. Eugene, as a devoted Catholic, always had the support of the church, and was strong with the Catholics in the rural districts, with whom his religion, and its growth and protection are a chief concern. Again, the business commercial classes are favorable to Napoleon, because he made Paris a beautiful city, which drew strangers there to spend their money lavishly. These are not sufficient reasons for restoring the Empire which admitted liberty of speech and the press, and substituted the will of the Emperor for the will of the people, but they do constitute strong inducements with certain powerful parties to the re-establishment of the Empire. Undoubtedly the Emperor has the good wishes of the royal powers in Europe, who observe with jealousy the spread of the Republican ideas of government. Let us hope that a constitutional monarchy, if not a French Republic, is establishing itself, and commanding itself to this futile and restless nation.

THE "pious policy" has been heard from at the South and its reception is what might have been expected. The South holds the balance of power and the Democracy or, as opposition, that expect to defeat Grant must of course conciliate the Southern wing. It is this circumstance that adds to the embarrassment of the situation. The "New Departure" was killed by Stephens, because it showed the Northern Democracy that the Southern Democracy would not accept their position and affiliate with them on such a basis.

It is just the same, only more so, with the passive policy. Another well-known Democratic leader at the South, Hon John Frey, editor of the Mobile Register, thus declares the antipathy entertained at the South to the "passive policy." He says:

"As it known, you Presidential Statesmen of the North, first, that you cannot make your game and beat Grant without our help in the South; and second, that you cannot get that help except on the condition of the clearest guarantees that we are to better our own national condition. The South comes to the front in this crisis, at least far enough to enunciate that it is not a matter to be bought and sold by political traders. It emerges from its ready retreat, where it has so long reposed that the North seems to have counted it out as an element in Presidential politics, to say that when a trade is made in such a case, the South will be the one to be deceived and have a hand in the making and in the fruits of the trade. You cannot bind us to the broken promises of a President who has been so long as to let us be deceived and have a hand in the making and in the fruits of the trade. You cannot bind us to the broken promises of a President who has been so long as to let us be deceived and have a hand in the making and in the fruits of the trade."
